Reinventing Professional Services is definitely not a step-by-step how-to guide. It is, however, full of insights, ideas, and anecdotes of specific ways Kaplan and countless others have used technology in simple or innovative ways. The professionals and their stories come from varied fields and offer diverse solutions to diverse needs. There is the real estate company in Miami that started a blog (linked to its website) in response to the changing ways people look for homes and realtors. And the accountant who has set up subscriptions for clients to access basic information online and who offers them weekly live-streaming videos on selected topics. At times I felt there were too many anecdotes, but the variety ensures that there is something for everyone. Kaplan has arranged the book in sections - positioning yourself for change, goal setting, adapting to and experimenting with technology, and taking risks - and concludes with a reminder that the overarching goal with all of this is to cultivate a community of people whose needs you know and who require and value your expertise. He notes that the book does not need to be read from start to finish, that readers can dive into the areas that look most useful for them. I found the first three and the last three chapters to be the most useful - the first three because they made the case for innovation and the last three because they offered very concrete suggestions. Reinventing Professional Services seems most geared toward the entrepreneur, the businessperson looking to gain more visibility and, well, business. Its value to the individual starting out or repositioning him or herself is obvious. Using Kaplan's suggestions for a larger, more established organization might pose a greater challenge.
